Thinking Globally
Living Jewishly

Under the guidance of Rabbi Nathan Lopes Cardozo, the DCA’s Jerusalem Think Tank, a forum of Jewish thinkers, educators and leaders, explores a wide range of Jewish topics. Think Tank Fellows present issues from their own lives – matters they struggle with every day – with the hope that exploring uncharted realms of Judaism in these challenging sessions will further invigorate authentic religious living with the hope that exploring uncharted realms of Judaism in these challenging sessions will further invigorate authentic religious living.

The Perfect Torah versus the Evolving Torah

In memory of Rabbi Dr. Nahum Rabinovitch z.l., Rosh HaYeshiva of Yeshivat Birkat Moshe, a master teacher and scholar.

This is the last of a seven-part series on the thoughts of the Mei HaShiloach, the famous and highly unusual work by the Chassidic thinker, Rabbi Mordechai Joseph Leiner of Izbica (Poland 1800-1854).

In this essay, Yehuda DovBer Zirkind discusses more of the thoughts of the Mei HaShiloach in light of my observations, adding many of his own (including many footnotes).

These matters are of the greatest importance, both for present Judaism and its future. This includes the new role which Halacha and religiosity should be playing in our lives and in the lives of our children.

These observations definitely do not represent “normative” Judaism as we know it today. Still, all these observations are deeply rooted in the (orthodox) Jewish Tradition. Many observations by the Mei HaShiloach touch on my opinion that Halacha will have to liberate itself from what we can only call “Defensive Halacha,” which became the norm while the Jewish people were living in Galut (exile), a condition which greatly hindered the organic development of Halacha, and in fact, derailed it.

For the last 2000 years, Halacha has been in a “waiting mode,” anticipating a time when it could liberate itself from Galut conditions and become genuine again. With the establishment of the State of Israel, when the Jewish people became once more independent, we see the first signs of this development. It is my view that in the years to come, Halacha will have to become “redemptive” and “prophetic”. It is up to our halachic authorities to ensure that this will happen in the near future. Regretfully, we see little of this within the circles of the official rabbinical establishment, which is still too much rooted in the “Galut mentality” from which we need to free ourselves.

Certainly, such a change will have to be done with utmost care, so as not to throw out the baby with the bath water. But it can surely be done when we follow in footsteps of the Mei HaShiloach and other “prophetic” halachic authorities of the past. We think of Rabbi Chaim Hirschensohn, Rabbi Avraham Yitzchak Kook, Chacham BenZion Uziel, Rabbi Moshe Shmuel Glasner, Rabbi Joseph Mashash, Rabbi Eliezer Berkovits and Rabbi Emanuel Rackman. All of them lived in modern times (19th-21th century) and were supreme halachic and religious masters. They looked into the future and realized that “defensive
In the previous essays in this series, we delved into the teachings of the Mei Hashiloach on God, Torah and Halacha. In the final essay of this series we will come full circle and return to the beginning of our discussion about the evolving Torah and the quest for the perfect Torah of the future.

The premise of this entire series is that alongside the “perfect Torah” paradigm, which views the Torah as a fixed and perfect Torah without any need for improvement or modification, there is another strand in Jewish thought which maintains that Torah—and thus also Halacha—is less-than-perfect and is slowly evolving toward a more ideal and perfect state. This concept of Torah is a core component of the hashkafa (religious outlook) of Rabbi Cardozo and other progressive Orthodox rabbis and a guiding principle in their attitudes toward Halacha.

Rabbi Cardozo rails against what he terms a “defensive” and “waiting-mode” Halacha and calls for a “redemptive” and “prophetic” Halacha capable of moving Judaism forward. He passionately believes that the current reactionary halachic system must be replaced by a visionary halachic system. In his presentation to the David Cardozo Academy Think Tank Reflections
Tank on the teachings of the Mei Hashiloach, Rabbi Cardozo spoke about the Mei Hashiloach’s vision of the Halacha of the future and his notion of Torah and Mitzvot as levushim (garments), which will be transcended in the messianic era.4

We will conclude our series with an exploration of various ways of conceptualizing and envisioning this Torah of the future. In addition, we will analyze how our vision of a futuristic Torah and a utopian Halacha can shape the Halacha of the present.

The Abrogation of the Law in the Future

One paradigm that we already mentioned in this series5 is the opinion mentioned in the Talmud that mitzvot beteilot le-atid lavo (the commandments will be abolished in the future).6 There is much discussion about the precise meaning and application of this concept. Another related concept is the notion that in the messianic era, a new Torah will be revealed, “A new Torah will emanate from Me.”7 According to several opinions, the Torah of the future will be radically different from the Torah that we have today, and many of the Mitzvot that are operative today will be abrogated in the future.8

The Primordial Torah and the Exiled Torah

A highly original view of the ideal Torah is the Kabbalistic concept of Torah ha-keduma (primordial Torah).9 According to Ramban (Nachmanides), Moshe Rabeinu copied a primordial Torah that preceded the creation of the world. This Torah was written in letters of black on white fire. Unlike the current combination of letters which forms words containing narratives and law, the letter sequence of the primordial Torah is divided to form a chain of divine names.10

Other authorities expound the idea that our Torah is rooted in a higher, spiritual Torah that represents the mind of God, but was garbed in the lowly physical garments of this materialistic world.11 Given our current condition, the mitzvot must be performed in an embodied, physical way. According to some Kabbalistic and Chassidic sources, in the future, when we will ascend to a higher spiritual level, the Mitzvot will similarly be performed on a spiritual plane in a manner totally different to what we are accustomed to today. The letters of the future Torah will be recombined to reveal the spiritual dimension of the Mitzvot.12

Moreover, the Kabbalist Rabbi Shlomo Elyashiv (1841-1926), also known as the Ba’al HaLeshem, propounds a radical idea according to which the Torah itself is in exile. The Torah we have today is a compromised Torah; it does not reflect the higher, pristine level of Torah that transcends the constraints of exile. In the age of redemption, the Torah itself will be redeemed from the shackles of exile.13

The Reestablishment of the Sanhedrin

This paradigm, based on Kabbalah and Jewish mysticism, envisions the Torah of the future as a spiritual manifestation of the divine light, and hence the mitzvot will also be elevated to a higher spiritual plane. There are, however, less rarefied and more pragmatic visions of what Halacha in the future will look like. Given our current condition, the mitzvot must be performed in an embodied, physical way. According to some Kabbalistic and Chassidic sources, in the future, when we will ascend to a higher spiritual level, the Mitzvot will similarly be performed on a spiritual plane in a manner totally different to what we are accustomed to today.
future will—or should—look like. These utopian visions are less concerned with the esoteric dimensions of Torah and more concerned with the tikkun (repair) of practical Halacha.

One strategy for implementing thoroughgoing changes in the Halacha is the reestablishment of the Sanhedrin (the Supreme Religious High Court of Israel). In fact, the hope for, and feasibility of, reinstating the Sanhedrin is something that has been hotly debated through various periods of Jewish history since the abolition of the Sanhedrin until the present day. Once the Sanhedrin is renewed it will theoretically be possible to revise many laws in the Torah which are perceived as problematic. There are many people who pin their hopes on the future Sanhedrin for effecting wide-reaching changes that will eliminate the morally problematic aspects of contemporary Halacha.

Thus, the famous Rabbi Avraham Yitzchak Hacohen Kook (1865-1935) states:

… if a question arises about some law of the Torah, which ethical notions indicate should be understood in a different way, then truly, if the Great Court decides that this law pertains only to conditions which no longer exist, a source in the Torah will certainly be found for it. The conjunction of events [that prompted the new interpretation], with [the reinstatement of] the power of the courts and the interpretation of Torah is not a coincidence. They are rather signs of the light of the Torah and the truth of the Torah's Oral Law, for we are obligated to accept [the rulings] of the judge that will be in those days [a reference to Jeremiah 2:3]…

The radical and conservative functions of Halachic utopianism

All this leads us to the question: what is the function that Halachic utopianism should play in the here and now? How can dreaming about a better halachic future help us in the present?

In a very insightful and illumination study, Professor Benjamin Brown from the Hebrew University in Jerusalem raises this question regarding the teachings of the Mei Hashiloach. He asks: if the Mei Hashiloach did not intend to implement his radical views regarding Halacha in practice, but merely preached “theoretical” or “neutralized” antinomianism (as indeed Professor Brown argues), what significance, if any, do his ideas hold for us living today in an unredeemed world?

In his article, Professor Brown argues, based on the work of other scholars, that dreaming about a Halachic utopia can serve two opposite functions: one of them “revolutionary” and one “conservative”. The radical function of utopian thinking is its ability to foment discontent with the status-quo and spark a revolution. Conversely, the conservative function of utopian thinking is its ability to provide a psychological coping mechanism to deal with a difficult situation in the present by providing hope for a brighter future. Throughout history, people have reacted differently to utopian visions. For example, within Judaism, the promise of a messianic utopia inspires some people to actively hasten the end of days, but it also has the opposite effect on others. Instead of inspiring revolution, it can actually help maintain the status quo by deferring the realization of an anticipated utopia to a distant eschatological age.
These two functions of utopian thinking can be applied to the dream of a halachic utopia. This will be demonstrated by an analysis of a Midrashic passage regarding the law of the mamzer.

In Kohelet we find:

So I returned and considered all the oppressions that are done under the sun and behold the tears of such as were oppressed. And they had no comforter, and on the side of their oppressors there was power, but they had no comforter.17

The Midrash (Kohelet Rabba) comments:

“Behold the tears of the oppressed”—their fathers sinned, but what has this to do with these insulted ones? The father of this one went to a woman forbidden to him, but how did the child sin, and why does it concern him? “They have no comforter … but in the hands of the oppressors there is power”—these are the hands of the Great Sanhedrin, which moved against them with the authority of the Torah and removed them from the community, because it is written: “A mamzer shall not enter in the congregation of the Eternal One.”18 “And there is none to comfort them”—therefore says the Holy One, blessed be He: “It is upon Me to comfort them…” As Zecharia prophesied,19 “Behold I see them all like pure gold.”20

This comment, attributed to Daniel the Tailor, an obscure figure,21 expresses profound moral discontent with the Halacha. It is noteworthy that the Midrash records the objection of an unknown figure and not that of a prominent rabbinic sage. We can speculate that perhaps it was inconceivable or too dangerous for such a statement to be uttered by a member of the rabbinic establishment. Therefore it had to be attributed instead to a rabbinic outsider who felt oppressed by rabbinic authority.

Furthermore, the midrash may be employing a subversive literary technique to protest against the halachic system indirectly. Being that it cannot explicitly critique the very system it represents, it does so vicariously by voicing a critique leveled by an outsider.22

The Midrash deals with Daniel’s protest against the injustice of the mamzer law with a promise that although in the present reality we have to suffer the injustice of the law, in the future this problem will be solved. The Midrash cites the prophecy of Zecharia in support of the view that in the future God Himself will purify the mamzerim.

What is the midrash seeking to accomplish? Is it a cry to action or a call for patience? Does the promise of the future purification of the mamzerim intend to send a signal that we must do all we can to limit the applicability of the law today? Or is the Midrash trying to placate Daniel—and perhaps even the rabbis—by saying, “yes Daniel, you’re right that the law is unfair, but there is nothing we can do about it! We can only wait for the day when God Himself will change the law”? According to the latter interpretation, the Midrash is actually imparting a more conservative message than the radical protest it is generally understood to convey.

The Midrash may be trying to temper the radical impulses of a Daniel, and people like him, by promising him that one day, when a perfect world order will reign, the negative effects of this law will be erased; in the meantime, we live in an imperfect world, where the law is still binding. Rather than offering a definitive interpretation of the Midrash, I am deliberately underscoring the hermeneutical ambiguities that this text presents. This highlights the paradoxical aspects of utopian Halachic thinking.

FUTURISTIC HALACHA: DREAM OR REALITY?

This ambiguity provides relevant insights for the role of utopian Halachic thinking regarding the contemporary halachic crisis. We feel that the more conservative voices within Orthodoxy will view all discussion of Halachic utopianism as something that is relegated to the Messianic Age. according to this perspective, the function of Halachic utopianism is twofold: 1) to help alleviate some of the cognitive dissonance caused by the discrepancy between Halacha and morality, by allowing people to indulge in the fantasy of a futuristic halachic utopia 2) to safeguard the integrity of the current Halachic system, by deferring any possibility of change to a future that lies beyond our reach.

On the other hand, there are other more revolutionary voices within Orthodoxy whose utopian Halachic thinking serves as a clarion call to action. One has only to recall Orthodox feminist Rabbanit Blu Greenberg Halachic desideratum: “where there is a rabbinic will, there is a halachic way.”23 I personally believe this statement should be viewed—at least in the current state of affairs—as an expression of utopian Halachic thinking, rather than a statement of fact.24 Nevertheless, both Rabbi Cardozo and I feel that it can, and should, serve as a catalyst for Rabbinic action at the present time which will also bring us one step closer to the utopian ideal.

We must also acknowledge the present-day limitations of achieving a total Halachic revolution and utopia. Sometimes halachic change is achieved best by means of evolution rather than revolution. In instances when radical change is impossible, the conservative function of utopian dreaming can serve us well. The imperfect reality of the present becomes more bearable when we are able to dream about a brighter future. The main thing is that we don’t give up hope nor lose sight of the desired goal!

Indeed, as Halachically committed Jews, we often need to walk a tightrope between halachic preservation and innovation, and maintain a fine balance between halachic conservatism and progressivism. Sometimes we need to declare that ke-shem she-mekablim sechar al ha-derisha kach mekablim sechar al ha-perisha (just as we receive reward for advancing novel interpretations, so too we receive reward for withdrawing [from this enterprise when necessary]).23 Indeed, the capacity for dialectical thinking and living has always been a hallmark of Jewish experience. The ability to anticipate redemption, while at the same time remaining firmly rooted within the present reality, is an essential feature of Jewish existence.

Without doubt, the ideal Halachic utopia of our imagination falls short of the contemporary Halachic reality. But it is precisely the gap between the imagined utopia of tomorrow and the gritty reality of today which fuels our hope for a better future and pushes us to take small steps today to ensure that today’s dream becomes tomorrow’s reality.

We hope you have enjoyed this series. For more essays by DCA ThinkTank members, see our website, www.cardzoacademy.org.

“Sometimes halachic change is achieved best by means of evolution rather than revolution. In instances when radical change is impossible, the conservative function of utopian dreaming can serve us well.”

2 Some of these rabbis include Rabbi Chaim Hirschensohn (1857-1935), whom we have already encountered in essay #2 in this series. Two of the more recent outspoken and controversial advocates of this approach are Rabbi Eliezer Berkovits (1908-1992) and Rabbi Emanuel Rackman (1910-2008).

3 See Nathan Lopes Cardozo, Jewish Law as Rebellion, chap. 2

4 Mei Hashiloach, vol. 1, folios 51b-52a on Bamidbar 19:2; Ibid., folio 19 on Tractate Megila 12b; Ibid., vol. 2, p. 122 on Tractate Megila 12b.

6 See Niddah 61b.

For a comprehensive presentation of the various views on this topic, see Abraham Joshua Heschel, Torah min Hashamayim Ba-aspaklaria shel Ha-dorot (Theology of Ancient Judaism), Vol. 3 (Jerusalem: JTS, 1995), 54-81 (Hebrew); Marc B. Shapiro, The Limits of Orthodox Theology: Maimonides’ Thirteen Principles Reappraised (Oxford: Littman Library of Jewish Civilization, 2004), chap. 8.

See the Ramban’s introduction to the Torah.

There is a vast literature on the topic of the Sanhedrin and the possibility of its renewal today. Recent attempts to reinstate the Sanhedrin has received much attention and generated many responses in the form of scholarly articles, media reports and blog posts. For a brief overview, see R. Moshe Tzuriel “Sanhedrin Achshav,” Techumin 18 (1998): 448–461, available online at: https://www.zomet.org.il/?CategoryID=268&ArticleID=272. For further reference, see the comprehensive bibliography listed in Prof. Nachum Rakover, Otzar Hamishpat s.v. Chi-dush Ha-Sanhedrin, available online at: http://gush.net/mishpat/otzar_queryU.php?subject=a06b08c02 and the sources cited in https://tinyurl.com/y9y6ban4; http://www.thesanhedrin.org/ and http://www.thesanhedrin.net/.

Kohelet 4:1.
20. Kohelet Rabba, Vilna ed., 4:1, section 1. The view that in the future mamzerim will be purified accords with the opinion of R. Yose. See Kiddushin 72b and Tosefta Kiddushin 5:4. Note that R. Meir disagrees with R. Yose. See the interesting difference of opinion between Kiddushin 72b and Jerusalem Talmud Kiddushin 3:13, 64d as to whether the Halacha is according to R. Meir that mamzerim will not be purified in the messianic era or according to R. Yose that mamzerim will be purified in the messianic era. For a detailed study on this topic, see Nathan Lopes Cardozo, Jewish Law as Rebellion, chap. 27.

24. In other words, I agree more with this famous quip when interpreted as an imperative statement issuing a moral call for change, as opposed to a declarative statement of fact asserting that the rabbis can currently find a satisfactory solution to every halachic problem, if only their desire to do so were strong enough. Taken as an imperative statement, its unequivocal tone is justified; however, as a statement of fact, I believe this claim is exaggerated. Unfortunately, there are halachic issues where despite the rabbis’ strongest determination and greatest efforts they are currently unable to come up yet with good halachic solutions - at least the way the halachic system is presently construed - due to objective halachic factors and/or legitimize ideological reasons; not just because their desire for change is not strong enough. Rabbi Cardozo believes that based on the observations of the Mei HaShiloach and the other halachic authorities mentioned above, much more can be done to solve these problems. He believes that it is more a matter of courage of the present halachic authorities than the absence of halachic sources and reasoning to be able to do so.

25. See Pesachim 22b; Kiddushin 57a; Bava Kama 41b; Bechorot 6b.